APPLE BLOSSOMS.

BY WILL M. CARLETON.

Underneath an apple tree
Sat a maiden and a lover;
And the thoughts within her, he
Yearned, in secret, to discover.
Round them danced the sunbeams bright,
Green the grass lawn stretched before them,
While the apple blossoms white
Hung in rich profusion o'er them.

Nought within her eyes he read
That would tell her tale unto him;
While her eyes (he after said)
Quivered quickly through and through him;
Till at last his heart burst free
From the prayer with which 'twas laden,
And he said: "When wilt thou be Mine forevermore, fair maiden?"

"When," said she, "the breeze of May
With white flakes our heads shall cover,
I will be thy bridling gay—
Thou shalt be my husband-lover."
"How," said he, in sorrow bowed,
"Can I hope such hopeful weather?
Breeze of May and Winter's cloud
Do not often fly together!"

Swiftly, as the words he said,
From the west a breeze came sighing,
And on each uncovered head,
Sent the apple-blossoms flying.
"Flakes of white!' thou'rt mine," said he,
"Sooner than thy wish or knowing!"
"Nay, I heard the breeze," quoth she,
"When in yonder forest blowing."

NOBODY.

BY AN "OLD BACH."

Returning home at close of day,
Who gently chides my long delay,
And by my side delights to stay?
Nobody.

Who sets for me my easy-chair,
Fixes the room with neatest care,
And lays my slippers ready there?
Nobody.

Who regulates the evening fire,
Piles the blazing fuel higher,
And bids me draw my chair still nigher?
Nobody.

When sickness comes to rack my frame,
And grief disturbs my troubled brain,
Who sympathizes with my pain?
Nobody.

OUR HONEYMOON.

"My dearest," said Fred, as we neared a little wayside station, "what do you say to some lunch? I can step out here, and get you anything you fancy. It may seem a dreadful thing for a bridegroom to confess, but I begin to feel quite sharp after our early dinner. If you don't mind my leaving you for five minutes—"

I signified that an absence of that duration might be supported, and Fred started for the refreshment room.

We had been married just three days, and the glamour of the honeymoon was upon everything—the atmosphere was rarified beyond that breathed by every-day mortals—the earth glorified with a new beauty—the heavens with a new light. We ate not bread and beefsteak, but some ambrosial dish untasted before, and drank golden nectar, etherealized from hotel coffee-pots.

I watched Fred from the car-window until he disappeared in the refreshment room. What a splendid fellow he was! Such eyes—such a mind—such teeth—such a heart—such a general combination of perfections! How charming—how delightful—how altogether inexpressible it was to belong to him forever, never to be separated more!—when, whiz! clang! Horrors! The train was off again—off, with Fred still discussing boned turkey in the eating-saloon, and his faithful wife hopelessly quiescent in the ladies' car—! sundering at the rate of thirty miles an hour those whom law and Gospel both declared only death should part.

"What's the matter, mum?" asked the conductor, noticing my excitement.

"There—there's a gentleman left behind!" I gasped.

"Is there, mum?" was the stoical reply. "Bless your soul, that's nothing new!"

"But—but—he's my husband!" I faltered, blushing to my finger-tips, as I felt that fact was something new.

Three ladies turned around to stare at me, and there was an unmistakable titter beneath the heavy moustache of a gentleman opposite.

"Sorry, mum, but it can't be helped. If gents will stop at bar-rooms to wet their whistles, we can't wait for 'em."

A bar-room! Fred in a bar-room, wetting his whistle! What did the odious man mean? I tried to crush him with a look, but I wasn't equal to it. Fred—my Fred—in a bar-room!

"You needn't be alarmed," said an old gentleman, kindly; "there will be another 'accommodation' at eight."

"At eight!" and it was now just half-past four. I sunk back upon the cushion in quiet desperation. What was to become of me?

With the entire abnegation peculiar to the early phases of the honeymoon, I had put my little velvet portemonnaie, handkerchief and vinaigrette in Fred's breast pocket—not that I hadn't a pocket of my own, but there was such a delightful novelty in feeling that now I had a right to his.

Was there ever a confiding bride left in such a plight? Without a husband and without a cent, and—not the least misfortune to one inclined to the feminine weakness of tears—without even a pocket-handkerchief.

"Ticket, mum."

The conductor was again making his rounds.

"I—I haven't any ticket," I stammered, in bewilderment.

"Two-thirty, then, if you please, mum, as far as Philadelphia."

"Ticket, sir—"

"Two-thirty, as quick as you can, mum—time's short."

"But my—my husband has my ticket," I faltered. "He was left at B—— station, you know?"

"Beg pardon, mum, but our orders are strict. That sort of dodge has played out on this line entirely! Two-thirty, mum, if you please. Will refund at the office, when ticket is presented."

The man suspected me, actually suspected me—Fred's wife! Oh, dear, dear! How utterly lonely and unprotected I felt, after the strong trust and sweet reliance that had been mine!

"I—I haven't any money," I said, in a faint voice. "You'll have to put me out somewhere, I suppose," I added, with determined resignation.

"Allow me, madam"—the moustached gentleman was up, pocket-book in hand—"let me arrange this matter for you until we reach Philadelphia. Your husband can settle with me afterwards," he said, giving me his card, with a smile.

If I hadn't been married, I should have fallen in love with that delightful man on the spot. As it was, I only murmured some unintelligible thanks, and slipped his card into my pocket as a memento of a modern knight.

We were to have stopped all night in Philadelphia. As the train neared the city a new perplexity seized upon me. Where could I go? If it were daylight I might remain in the ladies' waiting-room; but Fred would not arrive until nearly ten at night. I had no money to pay a hackman, go to a hotel, or even get my supper.

A sudden thought flashed into my mind—Aunt Tabby lived in Philadelphia! I had directed a letter to her only a few weeks before, announcing my approaching marriage. True, the reply was rather discouraging—being dismally prophetic of all sorts of evils that awaited me, and darkly suggestive of the snares and pitfalls in that broad road that leads to matrimony and destruction.

But Aunt Tabby took a vinegary view of everything. She never had felt the mellowing influence of a honeymoon.

We arrived at the depot; my moustached friend had left the car some time before, so I was unprotected again. An army of hackmen besieged the door of the depot, and I immediately became the subject of a struggle. Oaths and whips resounded about my ears, until I was finally seized upon and carried off by the most energetic of the party.

Having secured me in a very dirty vehicle, he regarded me with a triumphant grin.

"If you will get my trunk now, please," I suggested.

"Your trunk, is it? Where's the bit of tin?"

"The—what?" I asked, in perplexity.

"The tin—the bit of tin, to be sure. How am I to get it without the tin?"

My check! I had forgotten that Fred had the checks also. Alas! for the powerlessness of woman! I saw my new Saratoga, filled with the daintiest of trousseaus, bundled off with a lot of hotel baggage, and couldn't raise a finger to claim it. It was the last straw on the camel's back, and I drove in tears to Aunt Tabby's, using my tissue veil as a pocket-handkerchief, and thereby unconsciously tattooing my face with streaks of blue.

Even Aunt Tabby's monumental rigidity was overcome by my appearance, when she met me at her immaculate door-step.

"Left you! and only married three days! Pay that hackman, Mary Jane, and send him off before he sees any more of this family disgrace! Only three days! The Lord have mercy on us! That I should have lived to see brother Henry's child brought to this. Taken all your money and clothes, too! Well! well! it's nothing more nor less than I expected. Only an accident! Don't talk to me of accidents! If you ever lay your eyes on that man again, my name is not Tabitha Tintstitch! The mean-spirited scoundrel! to leave you without a rag to your back! You poor deluded innocent! Put on the kettle, Mary Jane, and hurry up the tea; this poor child is trembling like a leaf, and well she may!"

I was too dispirited and miserable to attempt to stem the torrent of Aunt Tabby's indignation. I let her talk on.

"Oh, and ain't it dreadful, mum?" I heard the sympathetic Mary Jane murmur, aside, to her mistress; "such a sweet young creeter as she be! And only look at her face! I expect he's been banging of her."

Aunt Tabby pursed up her mouth, and shook her head expressively.

"Let this be a warning to you, Mary Jane."

"Oh, I'm sure it will, mum," was the feeling reply.

"She'll never lay eyes on him again," repeated Aunt Tabby, solemnly; "never! Lord bless my soul! Who's that?"

There was a knock at the door that fairly shook the prim little house.

"Is my wife here?" asked a quick, anxious voice, and the next moment Fred's wife was there, clasped in the strong, brave arms—crying and laughing together on the broad, loving breast.

"How did you get here so soon? How did you find me? Oh, Fred! Fred! I have been so frightened and miserable!"

Fred's answer was a shower of kisses.

"How did I come? In a coal car. There was a train of them just behind. It wasn't the pleasantest ride in the world, but it brought me quickest to you—poor little frightened birdie!"

And as I met the glance of those loving eyes, I nestled closer to his heart and felt, in spite of Aunt Tabby's expectations, I was at home again.

The Boston Jubilee.

The chorus in 1869 was 10,000 strong. This year it is said to number 20,000. It embraces 165 societies, led by the famous Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, which three years ago would take no part in the festival, and this year was the first to offer its services. Of these 165 societies, 104 belong to Massachusetts, and 44 to the other New England States. New York city sends one—the New York Jubilee chorus, of which I never heard before—Brooklyn one, other parts of New York State four; Chicago one, St. Louis one, San Francisco one, the British Provinces one. And it is a curious illustration of the influence of jubilees upon the cultivation of art that nearly all these societies have been formed since the festival of 1869. The orchestra proper, consisting of 850 musicians, is drawn from various parts of the United States and Canada, New York furnishing nearly half. In addition to these there are 27 brass bands, besides the foreign military bands, the Marine Band, and the Emperor William's cornet quartette, making the whole number of instruments about 2,000, or more than twice as many as Mr. Gilmore had before. But the audience cannot be enlarged in proportion to the increased force of performers. The Coliseum which blew down last April was to have held 100,000 people; the Coliseum which has taken its place will hold about half as many. It is 550 feet long, and 350 feet wide; the famous building of 1869 was 550 feet long and 300 feet wide, and held 40,000 people, including the chorus. If 20,000 or 25,000 every day attend the performances this year the managers will get back the half million which their enterprise has cost them, and something handsome beside. But if the new building is very little longer than the old, it is very much handsomer. The plan is the same—a paralellogram, divided into a nave and two aisles, with square wooden columns between them. At one rise in banks the seats for the 22,000 performers, the instruments in the center, the singers ranged in semi-circles around them, the conductor in front, the powerful organ at the rear, with the key-board brought forward half-way to the conductor's stand. From the edge of the chorus seats a gallery runs round three sides of the building. The Coliseum is neatly painted—the outside a greenish drab with brown facings, the interior in delicately harmonized neutral tints, enlivened with streamers, heraldic devices, coats-of-arms, portraits of musicians, and rich hangings. There is no superabundance of drapery to deaden the sound, no gaudy coloring to offend the eye. The light, from countless windows in the clerestory and the roof, is tempered by painted glass, and the whole effect is elegant and cheerful. I cannot spare time for the favorite Boston amusement of counting the nails, and weighing the pounds of paint expended in the construction of this extraordinary edifice, nor can I tell you how many cubic feet of earth were required to make the new avenues that give access to it, crossing the steam railway tracks by substantial carriage bridges, and bringing the Coliseum into much closer proximity to the city practically than it was before. I must omit also a description of the immense reception rooms, retiring rooms, press rooms, telegraph rooms, offices, firemen's quarters, etc., that surround the auditorium.—Special Dispatch to New York Tribune.

☞ The character of the Liberal Republican movement in Chicago may be inferred from the following classification of the delegates chosen to the State Convention, to be held at Springfield on the 26th inst. The list numbers fifty-five, of which eighteen are defeated candidates for office, nine are ex-office holders, and six hold office at present. The delegation is literally an office-holders' and office-hunters' brigade. Such a selection of men to attend a State convention is unparalleled in the history of politics in Cook County. The eighteen have been defeated so often that further appeals to the Republican party are useless; the retirement of the nine was forced upon them by the people, and the six would gratify their constituencies most by resigning. This is Liberalism in Chicago. If it is the same all over the United States, their elevation to power would be a calamity to the nation, only equaled by the calamity to New York City of the reinstatement of Tammany.—Inter-Ocean.

☞ The San Francisco Alta says that President Grant has "gone slow but sure, firm and decided and cautious in every sense," and that "we have had peace during his Administration, and we will have four years more of peace and prosperity if he is elected."

The Coalition.

The scope of what the Springfield Republican calls, with caustic satire, the "beneficial revolution" begun at Cincinnati is now apparent. The movement is the most unprincipled coalition in our political history. Nobody is deceived by calling it a great moral and political revolution, because everybody knows that the worst things have often the finest names. The Inquisition was no less infamous because it was called the Holy Office; and the Cincinnati coalition is no less disgraceful because it is called by many good names. Mr. Schurz, Mr. Wells, General Cox, Mr. Atkinson, and their friends may have had high purposes in the Convention at Cincinnati. Mr. Schurz may even desperately decide, if Mr. Greeley is nominated at Baltimore, to take the chance of Greeley rather than the certainty of Grant. He may paint in repulsive colors what he believes to be the misdeeds of this Administration, and declare that we ought to overthrow it, and secure a pure and noble Administration, in which only honest men, with unselfish motives, will take part. But Mr. Schurz cannot deny that the Cincinnati movement has not founded a new party with great principles, but must end either in ridiculous failure or in a mere coalition.

After the recent Democratic conventions the coalition is probable. And will honorable and patriotic men who may be alienated from the present Administration, and have hoped for a kind of political millennium from Cincinnati, consider just what that coalition is? It is a combination of every element of discontent, of disloyalty, and disorder in the country; of the great mass of those who are known as unrepentant rebels, of negro-haters and repudiators; of the actual and theoretical enemies of the Union; of ancient and malignant Copperheads; of Republicans with personal grievances; of notorious and "played out" Republican politicians; of the Tammany and Brooklyn Rings, and of the worst classes in local politics; of the Ku-Klux and its abettors and apologists; and of some well-meaning men, utterly bewildered by the company which hustles and heaves them along. It is a coalition which Mr. Schurz is not yet willing to support, and in which the sole Republican name of national importance—if Mr. Greeley be excepted—is Mr. Trumbull. It is a combination whose cry is, "Anything to beat Grant," and whose overpowering element is the motley mass known as the Democratic party; and yet a combination which can hope to hold only the worst part of that party.

The Cincinnati movement, as such, has no general organization, and is merely contemptible in numbers and force. If, however, the coalition be made by the regular Democratic nomination of Mr. Greeley, the campaign of the coalition will be conducted by the Democratic organization, and will be the campaign of the Democratic party. It will be the last desperate struggle of that party to recover power. "Anything to beat Grant," is its cry; even the nomination of Greeley, if regularly made, because, although it will convulse the party, it will still leave the organization. Anything to beat Grant means merely anything to save the Democratic party. But if the real question of the election be one of principle, does any intelligent and patriotic citizen prefer the principles which the Democratic party has supported, now supports, or professes its willingness hereafter to support, to those which are the glory of the Republican party? Is it absolute equality before the law? Is it the national supremacy? Is it maintenance of the national faith? Is it the efficient protection of all citizens? Is it a wise generosity in dealing with the results of the war? And upon any of these does such a citizen believe the Democratic ascendency to be more desirable? If, on the other hand, the question of the election be one of administration solely, does the same citizen expect greater honesty, efficiency, and economy from the coalition, composed as we all know it to be, than from the Republican party?

In politics we deal with men and with imperfection. If any Administration should be judged by individual failures instead of general results, none could stand. But in every great election we are to decide upon probabilities. It is always an alternative. The Administration of General Grant has been slandered with unprecedented ferocity. But looking at it as it stands to-day, the object of immeasurable falsehood, what sensible, patriotic, honest man would not prefer the stability and security, the justice and harmony and order, which it promises, to the wild chaos of a Democratic restoration with Horace Greeley at its head?

We are told of reform. From whom and from what is it to proceed? Civil service reform, for instance, is loudly demanded and bountifully promised. The principle of a reform of the civil service is that the subordinate offices shall not be party rewards, nor bestowed to further individual interests. Is it the Democratic party that promises it? The doctrine of "the spoils" is a Democratic doctrine. It has been the most vital and sacredly reverenced of all Democratic traditions. Will anybody point to any proof that the Democratic party has renounced its faith and its practice upon this point? Or are we told that the Democratic party will be controlled in this reform by the Cincinnati managers? Who were they? They were most conspicuously not the civil service reformers who went to the Convention. They were the most notorious political brokers in the country. Are they in alliance with the Democratic party to give us civil service reform? Or is it to proceed from the bewildered band of honest men who are hurried along by the Cincinnati "crowd," as Mr. Adams called it? Hardly; for they are only the fly upon the wheel. Civil service reform in the mouth of the coalition means plunder. For the coalition is only the Democratic device to obtain control of the patronage.

The "Liberal Republican" enthusiasm, it will be observed, is almost exclusively Democratic. Those who declare for the Cincinnati candidates are not Republicans, except some individual or newspaper here and there, and in such cases some personal reason is often only too evident. It is the Democratic conventions and the Democratic orators who furnish the cries and the constituency for the Cincinnati movement. But, as we said, the coalition is the resort of desperation. The Democratic managers, in nominating Mr. Greeley, must, of course, paralyze and lose a very large Democratic vote. The World undoubtedly tells the truth in saying that "there are hundreds of thousands of true and tried Democrats who will stiffly refuse to vote for Mr. Greeley, whether he is indorsed at Baltimore or not." This is a reasonable view. If the Philadelphia National Republican Convention had nominated Horatio Seymour, is there any optimist who supposes that the Republican party would not have gone to pieces?

But the Democratic managers hope to make up the loss from the Republicans; and here they are doomed to disappointment. The American people know very well what they have to expect from the Democratic party, and they are not in the least perplexed in their choice between General Grant with the Republicans and Mr. Greeley with the Democrats. Mr. Greeley may be an older Republican than General Grant; but how long have Mr. Kissella, Mr. Creamer, Mr. Bradley, Mr. Morrissey, and the Tammany Ring, with Beauregard and Wade Hampton, been Republicans, or had the slightest sympathy with any principle or policy which Mr. Greeley has favored?—Harper's Weekly.

General News Summary.

THE OLD WORLD.

General Cordova, Spanish Minister of War, has telegraphed to the Governor-General of Cuba that the object of the Government in its policy toward that island is to maintain the integrity of its territory and secure a triumph to the Spanish flag. The Government desires to conclude the war as soon as possible, and completely restore peace throughout the entire island.

Madrid journals of the 3d deny the assertion that the Government of Spain had requested the recall of United States Minister Sickles.

According to a Madrid dispatch of the 24th, the affairs of Dr. Houard had been officially arranged by Minister Sickles and Senor Martas, Minister of Foreign Affairs. The American Government waives the question of the claim of Dr. Houard to American citizenship, and claims action upon the ground of friendly intercession in the Doctor's behalf for amnesty to be granted by the Spanish Government.

It was stated at Versailles on the 26th that negotiations for the complete evacuation of the French territory by the German troops had been brought to a favorable conclusion.

The Geneva Tribunal met on the 26th, but the proceedings were limited to a formal presentation of papers. A special to the New York Herald says: "The summary of the position is that the United States withdraws nothing of its claims, and both parties are fairly before the Tribunal. England, however, persists in her demand for a long adjournment."

The London Echo of the 26th says: "Notwithstanding the misapprehension by the American representatives of the intention of their Government relative to the indirect claims, we have reason to believe that the Treaty of Washington is safe." The Standard, however, was of the opposite opinion.

In the British House of Lords, on the 27th, Earl Granville made a statement to the effect that the Geneva Arbitrators had, "individually and collectively, concluded that the indirect claims do not constitute, upon principles of international law, a good foundation for awards of damages between nations, and should be wholly excluded from consideration, and would have been, even if no disagreement had arisen as to the competency of the Tribunal to decide thereon." The same announcement was made in the Commons, Mr. Gladstone saying: "I am at last permitted to say that the controversy between England and America relative to indirect claims is ended."

THE NEW WORLD.

Gold closed in New York on the 27th at 113⅝@113⅞.

Announcement has been made by the Post-Office Department that the law recently passed by Congress, providing for the introduction of postal cards, cannot go into effect for some time, as arrangements for the printing of the same had not been completed.

The attendance upon the Jubilee at Boston on the 21st was as large as the day previous. The day was devoted to Austria. The price of admission was to be reduced to $2 and $3, according to location.

After the adjournment on the 20th of the New York Fifth Avenue Hotel Conference, Judge Stallo called [illegible] dissatisfied with the acceptance of the Cincinnati ticket. The second Convention met on the 21st. Among those present were the following gentlemen: Col. Grosvenor, T. T. Gault, Carl Dantzer, Park Godwin, W. C. Bryant. The question of nominating a ticket was debated at considerable length, and was decided affirmatively, and the Conference nominated William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio, for President, and Frederick Law Olmstead, of New York, for Vice-President, and a series of resolutions was adopted declaratory of the principles of the Revenue Reformers, in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and against protection, "and that all trade or exchange should be as free as the necessities of the Government will permit; that Horace Greeley does not represent these principles, but has been a life-long opponent of the most essential of them; and that we therefore reject his nomination as we reject that of General Grant."

The boiler in the extensive shops of the Ohio Brush and Wire Works, located within the walls of the Ohio Penitentiary, at Columbus, exploded on the morning of the 21st, just after the convicts had started to work, with a terrible noise and dread effect. The flying boiler tore out of the large three-story building in which it was placed, making it a mass of ruins, and forced open the outside walls and roof of Huff's cooper shop and George Gill's stove foundry, not far off. Pieces of the boiler were thrown a tremendous distance. At the time of the accident eighty-five men were in the brush shop, and were just going to work. The shock was terrific, and yet no person was killed outright. Several men were blown out of the windows, and fell with the debris from the fourth story of the building. A large number were seriously injured, but it was thought that all but five or six would recover.

In the Nebraska Democratic State Convention, on the 21st, resolutions were adopted indorsing the Cincinnati Platform, and the delegates to the Baltimore Convention were instructed to vote as a unit for Greeley and Brown.

The recent Alabama Democratic State Convention decided to leave the appointment of Electors to the Congressional Districts after the Baltimore Convention. A resolution was adopted that the National Democratic Convention ought not to make nominations in opposition to the nominations recently made at Cincinnati.

The Arkansas Democratic State Convention, at Little Rock on the 21st, adopted resolutions instructing the delegates to the Baltimore Convention to vote for the ratification of the Cincinnati nominees, and declaring against the nomination by the Democracy of Arkansas of a State ticket.

A terrible accident occurred on the Grand Trunk Railroad on the night of the 21st. A telegram dated Belleville, Ont., June 22, gives the following particulars:

O. M. Roddy, an eye-witness, says that immediately after the disaster he went to the second-class car. It and the smoking car were telescoped on the locomotive, the steam from which, issuing from the cars, was so dense that he could see nothing. One after another of the scalded victims were crawling from the openings. Crowbars were immediately put into requisition by passengers from the first-class cars, all of whom escaped injury, and openings were made. Many were found entangled, and were extricated with the utmost difficulty, timbers having to be broken. Five persons were found dead and carried to the roadside, where the wounded lay for nearly three hours, in the most fearful agony.

The sight was one to baffle description. The terrible cries of the sufferers rent the ears of the lookers-on, who made every possible effort to grant their request for water; and their condition under the influence of their terrible injuries was fearful to witness, whilst prayers and cries of premonition of approaching dissolution were here and there heard. After the injured arrived here, some of them died—a happy relief being thus afforded from their terrible agonies. Those who were least injured walked about, swathed in bandages, and conversed freely about the occurrence of the night. The express and baggage car was forced past the broken engine without injuring the express messenger or baggage-man. But the smoking car telescoped the second-class car; the latter, in going forward, knocked the safety-valve off the boiler, and remained on top of the engine, allowing steam to fill the second-class car, which was crowded with passengers, many of them lumbermen en route for Quebec. The two first-class cars and Pullman car were comparatively uninjured, and the passengers were transhipped and went East this forenoon.

Sixty-five men and women were fearfully scalded and otherwise injured, six of whom died on the spot, and their bodies were brought to this place. Four more have died and others are dying every hour. Not more than one-third of the injured will live.

John Hilbert, engineer, was instantly killed and the fireman badly injured; one of his legs will have to be amputated.

A Belleville dispatch of the evening of the 22d says since the foregoing report was sent twelve more of the injured by the disaster had died, making twenty-three dead, and others were dying. Medical men stated that not more than six or seven of the sixty-five injured persons would live. The suffering and appearance of the wounded were frightful. The killed and wounded were all second-class passengers, the first-class escaping uninjured.

There were found in one package of currency recently returned to the Treasurer in Washington for redemption, seven counterfeit fifty-cent notes of the last series. The impression is that operators have succeeded in putting large numbers on the market.

A Grant and Wilson ratification meeting was held in Boston on the evening of the 22d, at which speeches were made by Governors Geary, of Pennsylvania, and Harvey, of Kansas; Judge Hoar; Generals Woodford and Butler, and others. Senator Wilson was brought into the hall at a late hour by a committee specially delegated to seek him and invite him, and spoke in response to the greeting extended to him.

By the explosion of carbonic acid during a fire in a drug store on Liberty street, New York, on the morning of the 22d, four firemen were killed immediately, and several others were severely, and some probably fatally, injured.

A special from Boston on the 22d to the Chicago Tribune says in almost every respect the Jubilee had been so far a musical success. The attendance during the week had not been all the managers had hoped for, although the audiences had been literally immense. The receipts for the week had been about $60,000. The original outlay was about $600,000, and the orchestra and foreign bands have to be paid. The foreigners draw $5 per day from the time they left until they arrive in Europe again, and their transportation and living expenses. The American players draw their transportation, and from $5 to $10 per day during the season. The solo artists are also paid heavily, but still the managers hoped to meet the expenses without drawing on the guaranty fund.

A New York dispatch of the 22d says that Frederick Law Olmstead had published a card stating that his name was used by the late Revenue Reform Conference in that city, without his knowledge, and he regretted that the Conference should have thought it expedient to take up as a representative of their requirements one who is so completely separated from the political field, and so much absorbed in professional duties, as he.

The Iowa State Republican Convention for the nomination of candidates for State officers has been called to meet at Des Moines, August 21.

A large meeting of Republicans was held in St. Louis on the evening of the 22d, to ratify the action of the Philadelphia Convention. The principal speakers were Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin; ex-Gov. Oglesby, [illegible] Henderson, of Missouri.

The National Division of the Sons of Temperance of North America closed its session in Chicago on the 22d. A resolution was adopted that the decision of all questions involved in the connection of colored persons with the Order be left with the Grand Divisions, respectively, in their several jurisdictions, subject to the review and control of the National Division at its annual sessions. The officers chosen for the ensuing year are: M. W. P., O. D. Wetmore, of St. Johns, N. B.; M. W. A., H. S. Bell, of Louisiana; G. S., S. W. Hodges, of Massachusetts; N. W., W. A. Duff, of Pennsylvania; M. W. C., W. O. Clark, of California; M. W. S., Mr. Brice (colored), of Maryland.

The number of deaths by the recent accident on the Grand Trunk Railroad in Canada, up to the 24th, was thirty, principally lumbermen and telegraph line builders from the Province of Quebec. The Coroner's Jury found that the disaster "was purely accidental; that, in our opinion, the track was in good condition; that the engineer was a sober, efficient and careful officer, and died at his post."

Dr. G. A. Sturges, of Michigan, Principal Examiner of Navigation and Fire Arms in the Patent Office at Washington, died on the 24th.

The strike of the piano-makers in New York ended on the 24th, all the men having resumed work at ten hours. The men employed by Weber and Steinway alone got the advance in wages, viz., 10 per cent. The cabinet-makers continued their meetings and still predicted success for their strike in a few days.

A collision occurred on the 22d, between a mail train and a freight train on the Pittsburgh, Washington & Baltimore Railroad, near Connellsville, Pa., causing the death of Henry Paxton, Conductor Robt. Lockhart, and Mail Agent J. Blackburn, and the serious injury of eight passengers, and slight injury of about nine others. Both trains were wrecked.

A sacred concert was given in the Boston Coliseum on Sunday, the 23d, and was listened to by about 9,000 persons. The second week of the Jubilee was inaugurated on the 24th by the presentation of Handel's Grand Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt."

The lower House of the Missouri Legislature on the 24th passed a concurrent resolution relating that as grave doubts exist in both Houses about the power of the Governor to divide the State into Electoral Districts, both Houses adjourn sine die at twelve o'clock, and request the Governor to re-convene the General Assembly for the purpose of redistricting the State. The Senate struck the preamble from this resolution, and passed it. The House agreed to the amendment, and the Legislature adjourned at noon. Governor Brown immediately issued a proclamation reconvening the General Assembly at two o'clock. The Senate then passed a bill dividing the State into thirteen Congressional districts.

A Washington dispatch of the 25th gives the following as the supplemental article to the Treaty of Washington, as amended and agreed to by the Senate—43 to 8. Absent, or not voting, 23:

Whereas, The Government of her Britannic Majesty has contended, in recent correspondence with the Government of the United States, that the losses sustained in the transfer of American commercial marine to the British flag, the enhanced payments of insurance, the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion: Firstly, were not included in the Treaty of Washington; and, secondly, should not be admitted in principle as growing out of acts committed by particular vessels alleged to have been enabled to commit depredations on the shipping of a belligerent by reason of such want of due diligence in the performance of neutral obligations as that which is imputed by the United States to Great Britain; and,

Whereas, The Government of the United States has contended that said indirect claims were included in the Treaty, and

Whereas, Both Governments adopt for the future the principle that claims for remote or indirect losses should not be admitted as the result of failure to observe neutral obligations, so far as to declare that it will hereafter guide the conduct of both Governments in their relations with each other;

Therefore, In consideration thereof, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, consents that he will make no claim on the part of the United States in respect of indirect losses as aforesaid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva.

Delegates-at-Large to the Baltimore Convention were chosen, and a resolution was adopted requesting them to vote for the nomination of Greeley and Brown.

The Belleville Horror.

Mr. Roddy, who witnessed the recent accident near Belleville, makes the following statement to the Toronto Globe:

"I reside at Peterborough, and am manager for Mr. Watson, who has the contract for building the Dominion telegraph line from that place to Barrie. On the night of Friday last, I took the train at Port Hope for Brockville, having with me eleven men who had been working for me, and to whom I had granted four days' leave of absence, to allow of their visiting their families, all of whom lived in the lower province. They were all steady, hardworking men. I was in the smoking-car, and after remaining a short time, I went into the second-class and asked my foreman to come with me into the first-class part of the train; but he declined to do so. I then returned there alone and lay down upon the seat, when I suddenly felt a jar, as if some of the cars in the fore part of the train were tipping over. I tried to open the window of the car I was in, but it appeared to be jammed, and I got out of the door and ran to see what was the matter but for a short time could not do so for the dense cloud of steam. After a moment or two, I managed to get to the front of the train, and from there into the uppermost side of the second-class car. I tried to open the windows; but, finding I could not do so, ran round to the platform side of the smoking car, and got a crowbar out of a number which belonged to our men. I saw that the two cars were "telescoped." I then commenced to break the windows of the second-class car, and several of the men came out through them. I smashed in the door, and as the steam had pretty well dispersed, I went in and found some of the men sitting in their seats, apparently stunned and unconscious. Conductor Neilson, the Pullman car conductor, and two volunteers from Port Hope—one of them was named Skitch—then came in, and we went to the middle of the car and saw that the side was completely smashed, and there were many of the passengers buried in the ruins. We immediately commenced lifting them out, and as I was thus engaged, I found two little children lying in the bottom of the car, quite dead. The clothes of all those I touched were so hot that I could hardly bear to handle them. One woman, who I believe to be Mrs. Callender, died just as she was lifted out. The safety-valve of the engine protruded right into the car, and I do not think there was a particle of water two minutes after the engine went over on its side. When all the passengers had been got out I went to look at the engine, and saw Hibbert, the driver, lying between the engine and the broken truck of one of the cars, quite dead. Five of the others died before they could be removed. The sight was an awful one. As soon as the men got into the cool night-air, they began to suffer dreadfully, and their cries were frightful to hear. They tore their clothes off, and many of them jumped the fence and fled across the fields, crying out the whole time most pitifully. One man got away at least a quarter of a mile before I could catch him, and another was half a mile off when he was found. Belleville was communicated with, and a train was soon on the spot; but before it arrived the scalded people began to complain of cold, so with some of the loose planks we made fires. The people were then placed on the train and taken to Belleville. Most of my men had considerable sums of money with them. The damage done was strictly confined to the two cars mentioned—the second-class and the smoking. The post-office attached, with its occupants, escaped by something little short of a miracle. The first-class and Pullman cars, (though the former got off the track) and their passengers sustained no injury. It is a most singular thing that, among all the number of killed and wounded, with about two exceptions, viz.: the driver and another man, those injured did not sustain the slightest contusions; but the scalds were something beyond all description. A visit to Belleville freight shed on Saturday evening was sufficient to unstring the strongest nerves, and create a feeling of pity in the hardest heart. There, stretched out upon the trestle beds or mattresses laid upon the floor amongst the goods, were some fifty fearful looking objects, some writhing about in the acutest agony. Others, exhausted by the pain they were suffering from the scalds and the steam they had inhaled, lay perfectly passive while some kind female or man dressed their hurts with cooling lotions, or kept a current of air about them with fans. The poor creatures, with their swollen and bandaged features and limbs, presented an appearance which can never be effaced from the memories of those who saw them. The patients whom death early released from the agony passed away, without exception, in the quietest manner. No struggle, no painful gasping for breath, but they seemed to sink into a doze, which gradually changed into the sleep of death."

Romantic History of Tweed's Diamond.

Boss Tweed's diamond has attained world-wide notoriety from the prominence given to it in Nast's well known delineations of the great Master of the Ring. It is a stone of great beauty and purity of color, weighs something over twelve carats, and is valued at about $15,000 in gold. It was imported by a diamond dealer in New York, in whose office it was seen and admired by the leading leaders of such baubles. At the request of a dealer in this city, whom for convenience sake we will call G., it was brought to Boston, and by him sold to a gentleman in this city, who wore it as a "solitaire" pin.

But in time the owner tired of his trinket, and another Boston dealer—M., we will call him—offering to find a purchaser for it in Chicago, it was intrusted to him. M. did not go to Chicago, but stuck the pin in his shirt bosom and "sported" it in New York for some days, trying to sell it, but without success. He accordingly returned to Boston, surrendered the gem to its owner, and he, in turn, took it to G. for safe-keeping and sale should a buyer appear.

Now it chanced that M., just previous to his appearance in New York with this sparkling jewel in his bosom, had returned from Europe with a small invoice of gems which he had regularly entered at the Custom-House. The keen detectives at that institution, ever on the watch for a fat reward for detecting smuggling, thought they smelled the odor of a very large-sized rat about this affair, jumped at once at the conclusion that the smaller stones had been passed through the Custom-House as a "blind" merely, and that the large one had been brought in contrary to law.

Accordingly they came to Boston, took possession of M.'s premises, got the keys of his safe, examined his books, and comported themselves as agents of the Government are wont to do when fraud upon the revenue is suspected. But they found nothing, and were about to give up the case, when they learned accidentally that G. had a large diamond in his possession, whose description corresponded exactly with the one they had seen flashing upon M.'s breast in Gotham.

Following up this lead, they called upon G., and asked to see the large diamond of which they said, "a friend had told them." G. courteously responded, when one of the pair, after carefully examining the stone with a glass, informed his companion that "that was the stone."

G. was then told that the stone had been smuggled, and that he would have to surrender it to them. G. quietly remarked that he didn't know them, shouldn't surrender the stone, and that they couldn't have it unless they took it by force. After some parley, it was decided that the stone should be taken to Collector Russell of this port; that he should have custody of it, and become personally responsible for its return in case the charges proved to be unfounded, and that in no case should he allow it to be taken to New York.

Then the detectives went to work, and so did G., who, having bought the stone direct from the importer, could trace it much quicker than the officials. In three or four days he was able to give Collector Russell the exact page and line of the Custom-House record book of entries where it had been entered, with its weight, description, invoice, duty, etc., as well as the name of the parties who shipped it and by whom it was received. Upon investigation this proved to be a straight story, and before the detectives had fairly begun to work up the case, Collector Russell sent a polite note to G., asking him to come and take the stone away, as he did not care to be responsible for so valuable a piece of property.

From G.'s store the stone went to New York, where it was re-set, and surrounded with one-carat stones, and in this shape it was bought by Boss Tweed, who, we believe, still wears it. Where it came from, or how many years or centuries it has been worn, no one knows, nor can one even conjecture into whose hands it may fall, and what changes it may see in the near and far distant future; for though Tweed and all his followers may fade out of the memory of men, though centuries may pass away, and with them the name and fame of nations, now of first rank, that stone will retain all the beauty, all the marvelous lustre, and all the value it now has—in truth, "a thing of beauty and a joy forever."—Boston Bulletin.

Misdirected and Unmailable Letters.

The [illegible] American people is strikingly shown by a statistical statement in the Postal Record of the number of letters sent to the Dead Letter Office during a single year. It appears that during last year nearly three millions of letters were received at that office, of which 68,000 could not be forwarded, for the reason that the name of the County and State were left out of the direction; 400,000 were unstamped, and more than 3,000 were mailed with no direction at all.

Some of the unstamped letters may have lost their miniature portraits of American statesmen through the non-adhesiveness of Uncle Samuel's mucilage, but how three thousand persons could mail simply blank envelopes passes our comprehension. It must be that they were bound to write a letter to some disagreeable acquaintance, to fulfill the letter of the law of correspondence, and thus deliver themselves from the burden of "owing a letter" without the corresponding obligation of receiving an answer, or else the American people are wonderfully careless.

The strangest part of this statement is that there were found in these letters money orders to the amount of two millions of dollars. That a tired lover or a cold friend should write a tender epistle and trust it to the hands of a Post-office clerk, in an envelope innocent of even a single line of direction, is perhaps possible; but that old John Cashdown should send off letters to his business correspondents in the same fashion is hard to be believed.

☞ The charges against Rev. M. J. Cramer, our Minister to Denmark, which have been so widely circulated by anti-administration papers, were some time ago found entirely groundless by the Government. But in order that the Church, of which he is an accredited minister, might not suffer obloquy by countenancing any possible misconduct of Mr. Cramer, the Cincinnati Methodist Conference appointed a committee to investigate the charges. That committee has made its report. Witnesses from Copenhagen furnished testimony by letter, and the result is that the accused is completely exonerated, and that he is declared to be the victim of slander originating in partisan feeling.

—The Yale Courant says: Here is a specimen of Japanese English, which passed between a Japanese student in town and his landlady: "I told you other day, that I would move from here to Wall street; but I will not move for my convenient, and I will oblige to you for more little while. I will move here any time if you promise somebody to lend the room to him. I am very sorry for that I could not always get home at supper time. Are you convenient that I have tea at late?"

☞ Mr. William Cullen Bryant has this opinion of General Grant's candidacy: "General Grant is unquestionably the choice of the lay as well as of the official members of the regular organization. After the virulent speech of Senator Sumner against him, indeed, it is difficult to see how any Republican, who does not differ from the Administration on grounds of principle, could fail to throw up his hat for Grant."

—A Scotch court has affirmed the responsibility of a man for his offspring to the fourth generation. The Inspector of Poor for the parish of Talbot recently advanced aid to a widow with five young children, and brought suit in the Small Debt Court to recover the amount from her grandfather. Against the liability a vigorous but ineffectual defense was made.

A Clergyman, having made several attempts to reform a profligate, was at length repulsed with, "It is all in vain, doctor; you cannot get me to change my religion." "I do not want that," replied the good man, "I wish religion would change you."

—A Yankee doctor has contrived to extract from sausages a powerful tonic, which he says contains the whole strength of the original bark. He calls it the sulphate of canine.
